

Reading Comprehension

Harriet Tubman was born about 1820 and was originally named Araminta Ross. She was born to slaves Benjamin Ross and Harriet Greene on a plantation in Dorchester County, Maryland. She was one of eleven children in her family.

In 1844, her slave master allowed her to marry John Tubman, who was a free black man. By this time, Harriet had taken her mother's first name. When her slave master and his heir died, Harriet's status as a slave was in question, because her freedom had never been granted. Rather than take any chances, she moved to the north without her husband.

While living in Pennsylvania, Harriet got involved with the abolitionist cause. She became a conductor on the Underground Railroad, which helped slaves escape from the South. In a period of about ten years, Harriet helped about 300 slaves escape slavery in the South, guiding them to freedom in the North.
